Thought of the week

2024 saw strong returns overall, but with greater variability in performance across asset classes compared to 2023. Headlines were dominated by tragic conflicts, the U.S. election and soft vs. hard landing debates, but fundamentals remained the key driver of returns.

The clear winner was U.S. large-cap equities, achieving another year of 20%+ gains – a rare feat for the S&P 500, which has only seen consecutive 20%+ annual returns four times since 1900. Despite anticipated negative earnings growth, small caps climbed a solid 11.8%, fueled by optimism around deregulation and corporate tax cuts. Global high yield bonds benefited from central bank cutting cycles and low levels of defaults, rising 9.1%. EM equities had a better year, led by China’s impressive rebound following fiscal and monetary stimulus announcements in September and strong performances in Taiwan and India. On the other hand, DM equities lagged with only a 3.4% rise, hampered by yen and euro weakness and economic downturns in major eurozone markets. Despite the Fed’s rate cuts bringing down short rates, cash had its highest return since 2000. Next year should see more modest cash returns as the Fed continues its slow easing cycle. Commodity prices saw modest gains due to softening global demand. However, certain commodities like LNG and gold had robust returns, rising 67% and 27%, respectively. REITs rose 3.9%, constrained by elevated rates and sluggishness in office and retail sectors. Finally, U.S. fixed income finished the year on a down note, affected by economic resilience and elevated long rates, partly due to fiscal concerns.

This year’s wide performance dispersion underscores the importance of rebalancing portfolios, as some sectors’ impressive runs have left valuations high and susceptible to pullbacks.
